You're not wrong. For all we know, if humans never hunted, then there would be too many animals on Earth.

I agree up to a certain point. For many people it's a steady source of food and is a way of wildlife management because in some areas, predators are no longer there to keep the other wildlife in check. I don't have an issue with hunting, but I have an issue with poaching.

Yes. People have done a lot of really bad things, but hunting for survival is not one of them.

Hunting: fine
poaching: filter no. I don't care what your excuses are for poaching, It's not RIGHT. Period. End of conversation (Think of all those poor endangered animals)

Precisely. If we didn't hunt at all, we probably wouldn't have been able to survive for this long. However, like virtually everyone else here, I agree that poaching is wrong. Kill to survive: Yes. Kill for sport: No.

Occasionally animal populations can get too high for their safety (eat too many plants, not enough plants in the future) and hunting them can actually be beneficial for the species' long term health in that area
